Foreword

Brickline connects two kinds of small business that need each other. Web-only brands have products people want to hold before they buy. Independent shops have shelf space and regulars, and want new reasons for people to walk in.

This presentation sets out the identity I designed for Brickline: the wordmark and tagline, the palette and type, and how they carry onto shelves, take-home cards and the web. It is the reference for anyone putting Brickline in front of a shop owner, a brand or a shopper.

The Brand

The Goal

Brickline has to earn trust from two audiences at once. Shop owners need a partner that respects their space. Online brands need to see a real retail channel.

Make a two-sided marketplace feel like one neighborhood brand.

ON A SHOP'S SHELF

Quiet enough to sit beside someone else's products and signage.

IN A SHOPPER'S HAND

Clear enough that a take-home card still makes sense a week later.

Why we exist

So a good product doesn't need its own storefront to be found on a real street.

Who we serve

Web-only brands with inventory but no shop, and independent retailers with shelf space and foot traffic.

What we believe

Shelf space can be shared. Local shops and online makers do better as neighbors than as competitors.

How we show up

Quietly, on someone else's shelf. A card, a code and a link, written plainly.

What sets us apart

The shop earns on every sale it sends without buying stock. The brand keeps its customer and its site.

Where we're headed

A shelf in every neighborhood, so online brands can grow block by block.

The Wordmark

BRICKLINE is set in Montserrat Regular, all caps, with wide letter spacing. Each capital gets the same room on either side, like bricks laid in a course with even mortar joints.

One weight and no symbol keep it calm. It has to share a shelf with other brands' packaging, so it stays out of their way and still reads from across a shop.

The Lockup

The tagline sits centered under the wordmark in lowercase Montserrat, in Concrete gray. Its two halves name the two sides of the service: the brands' products and the shops' spaces. The bullet joins them.

Use the full lockup where there's room to read it. Use the wordmark alone in tight spaces, headers and small print.

Clear space
At least the height of the B on every side

Color Variations

The lockup comes in four versions. Red on white is the lead. Charcoal on white is for partner materials where red would compete. The reversed versions sit on Charcoal or Brick Red. The tagline always stays one step quieter than the wordmark.

Logo Usage

Brickline often appears inside someone else's shop, next to their signage and other brands' packaging. These rules keep it legible there without shouting.

DO

- ✓ Use one of the four approved color versions
- ✓ Keep clear space of at least the height of the B
- ✓ Drop the tagline when the lockup would be under 1 inch wide
- ✓ Place it on flat color, or on a photo behind a solid band

DON'T

- – Tighten the letter spacing or stretch the wordmark
- – Set the tagline in red or at the same weight as the wordmark
- – Put red on red, or charcoal on a dark photo
- – Lock it up with a partner's logo without a divider

Color Palette

Brick Red and Charcoal come straight from the street: red brick and the dark mortar between it. Concrete gray carries the tagline and supporting text. Slate and Sidewalk fill in on print and screen. Mortar is the darkest tone, added for the website.

Slate

Color Usage

Red is the signal. It marks Brickline on a crowded shelf, the offer on a card and the action on a screen. Neutrals do most of the work so the red stays rare enough to mean something.

Grounds. Charcoal and Mortar for the site frame, dark tiles and card backs.

Reading. White and Sidewalk behind anything longer than a line.

Signal. Red for the logo, the offer and the button. Concrete (10%) for supporting text.

4.

Montserrat

One family does everything, from the wordmark to the fine print on a card. Julieta Ulanovsky drew Montserrat from the old signs and shopfronts of Buenos Aires' Montserrat neighborhood, which suits a brand about neighborhood storefronts.

Regular carries the logo and print. SemiBold and Bold give the website its headlines.

Typography Hierarchy

Headlines are bold and tight. Labels borrow the logo's wide tracking. Body copy stays at Regular, with room to breathe.

The Shelf Card

A 2 × 3.5 inch take-home card sits next to each product. The front belongs to the partner brand: its logo, a 10% offer and three steps. The back is pure Brickline red.

The code on each card tracks which shop sent the sale, so the card works as both the checkout and the commission record.
